Expansion of settlements

- 19 years later, Jordan Valley town gets building approval. After a construction freeze of 19 years, Defense Minister signs off on urban building plan - is it a sign of approaching sovereignty? Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon (Likud) has signed his approval for the urban building plan of Hemdat, a town in the Jordan Valley that has had its construction frozen for the past 19 years. Shalom Kuperman, a member of the Hemdat secretariat and one of the most long-standing residents of the town, spoke to Arutz Sheva on Wednesday about the welcome news. Kuperman noted that around 40 families live in the town, and said that with the approval "we are approaching building processes for a new neighborhood." Without an approval on the urban building plan, all construction in the town had automatically been classified as illegal, blocking the natural development of the town - a situation replicated in Jewish towns and villages throughout Judea and Samaria. "This approval opens for us all the possibilities for developing Hemdat and the (Jordan) Valley," he said. Kuperman described how established families have been waiting to build their homes in Hemdat, and likewise new families hoping to join the community have been delayed as they couldn't have houses built for them. Aside from personal houses, the long wait for approval has caused the town's synagogue, kindergarten and day care center to be housed in caravans. In addition, roads and infrastructure have not been developed or maintained for nearly 20 years - but now that all is set to change. "As a town of law-abiding citizens who want to develop the (Jordan) Valley and the entire country, this delayed us. We couldn't draw up contracts for the purchase and sale of houses. It delayed all development of life here," said Kuperman. (Israeli National News 3 March 2016)
