Other

- Israeli Army Prevented American Diplomats From Visiting Jordan Valley Palestinians. Though the IDF claimed the area is a closed army training zone, the site is home to two Israeli settlements, one of which is an illegal outpost still under construction. The Israeli army on Thursday prevented American consular diplomats from entering an area in the northern Jordan Valley where a Palestinian shepherds' encampment was recently demolished and a new and illegal settler outpost is being built. The diplomats were scheduled to visit the area of Tel al Hema with activists from the all-female Machsom Watch group, which monitors army checkpoints. On arrival at the Al-Auja region, just north of Jericho, the two diplomats and a large security detail were informed by the Israel Defense Forces that Tel al Hema was a closed firing zone, currently hosting army training exercises. The delegation was attempting to reach Khalet Hamed, a community adjacent to the Israeli settlements of Mehola and Givat Salit, created in 2001, which is not inside an IDF firing zone and can be directly accessed by Route 90. Residents from Tel al Hema who spoke with Haaretz said they did not see or hear any army training in the area. The IDF said in response that the people who prevented the delegation from reaching the site were officials from the Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories (which is under army and the Defense Ministry's oversight). Dafna Banai from Machsom Watch told Haaretz that the diplomats had also intended visiting the shepherding communities of Ras al-Ahmar and Khalet Makhoul. Ras al-Ahmar, a community in which dwellings were demolished about a month ago, was the scene of an IDF exercise on Tuesday, requiring the inhabitants of the encampment to leave for the entire day. But they returned the next day and were present on Thursday, with no reports of military exercises in the area. The Civil Administration responded: "Representatives of the American consulate contacted us this morning, asking that a visit to Ras al-Ahmar be facilitated in accordance with standard procedure. The request was received while the people in question were already on their way. Given that there was a military exercise underway and the request had not been made ahead of time, the consulate officials were asked to arrange their visit on another date, in order to avoid unnecessary danger. “Contrary to what was written in the article, the consulate and the Civil Administration work together in coordination and cooperation and it was agreed to hold the visit on another date”. (Haaretz 4 November 2016)
