Others

- Plans to build a cable car to the Western Wall in Jerusalem passed a major stage in the approval process Monday after the National Infrastructure Committee rejected all remaining objections to the controversial plan. Opponents fear the project would mar Jerusalem's Old City and bolster the Jewish presence in the Arab neighborhood of Silwan. The cable car is being promoted by the Tourism Ministry and the Jerusalem Development Authority. The line would include three stops, the first at the First Station complex at the end of Emek Refaim Street across from Mount Zion. The plan will now be submitted to the government for approval. The committee said after the approval that the "plan offers a true solution to the difficult problem of access to the southeast basin of the Old City and will provide an answer to sightseers, residents and tourists," referring to the area near the Western Wall, City of David and Dung Gate.
