- According to Axios, the Board of Directors of the Jewish National Fund is expected to approve a new policy on Sunday (February 14) allowing the organization to directly purchase land in Area C of the West Bank for the purposes of facilitating settlement expansion (which is illegal under international law and opposed by governments the world over as a violation of Palestinian rights). If this new policy is indeed adopted, the JNF will officially make financing the Israeli settlement enterprise a loud and proud part of its mission. This would be a shift not so much in policy as in public relations, given that the JNF has long worked in support of settlements, but until this point has left settlement-related activities deliberately obscured. The shift in approach that will culminate in Sunday's vote is in line with the JNF's new right-wing, settler leadership (which effectively took control of the organization in October 2020). According to the report, the proposed JNF policy – which could see hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the settlement enterprise – includes directives for the organization to purchase land subject to the following conditions: The land is privately owned by Palestinians. The land will be used to expand existing settlements, not build new ones (this presumptively includes purchasing land to build outposts). The land is in Area C (some 60% of the West Bank), not land in Areas A and B. The land is located inside of a settlement's jurisdiction or adjacent to it. Focus will be on purchasing land in areas identified as a priority, including the Jordan Valley, the Etzion settlement bloc, areas around Jerusalem, the Binyamin region north of Jerusalem, the South Hebron Hills, and areas adjacent to the pre-1967 border. The draft specifically says that no land shall be purchased in the Nablus or Jenin areas. Foreign donations will only be used to purchase land in the West Bank if the laws of the donor's country permit it. (FMEP 13 February 2021)
