Expansion of Israeli Settlements

- Israel's outgoing attorney general Avichai Mandelblit has okayed the reconstruction of the evacuated settlement of Evyatar in Beita town south of Nablus, in the northern West Bank. Avichai Mandelblit has approved the move on his last day in his position. Evyatar settlement was evacuated seven months ago, amid growing Jewish calls for its reconstruction. The move came as part of a deal between the Israeli government and West Bank settlers that would retroactively authorize the outpost establishment without official approval. Under the agreement reached last year, the settlers left the outpost "peacefully" and the area became a closed military zone, with the houses and roads erected remaining in place. As part of the deal, a survey was carried out which, according to Israeli media reports, determined that part of the land was allegedly not owned by Palestinians, paving the way for the establishment of a religious school and for some settler families to return. The move pushes forward the deal, which still needs a final green light from the army minister Benny Gantz, who signed on to the plan last year. (PALINFO 2 February 2022)
- The Israeli occupation authorized, a settlement scheme for 1,500 units in occupied Jerusalem between the French Hill and the Hebrew University. The 1,500 colonial units will consist of 500 housing unit for Israeli students, 200 fortified rooms, in addition to residential buildings for long-term occupancy and public properties. - The Israeli government intends to meet within the coming few days to "legalize" and provide infrastructure for illegal colonialist outposts built on stolen Palestinian lands in the occupied West Bank. Israeli Kan News said the government wants to discuss the efforts to "legalize" dozens of illegal colonialist outposts ahead of providing them with infrastructure. The "legalization" attempts aim at connecting the outposts with electric grids, water, and sewage networks, in addition to infrastructure, which will also mean further annexation of private Palestinian lands. The meetings will include various officials and representatives of several government ministries and would take place in building the “Justice Ministry.” Several days ago, Israeli Channel Seven said a meeting is scheduled between Israel’s Interior Minister, Ayelet Shaked, with the Defense Minister, Benny Gantz, to reach an agreement on a plan that would “legalize” the outposts and provide them with infrastructure, including water and electricity. Ayelet Shaked, a member of the right-wing Jewish Home Party, is behind various efforts to legalize outposts and provide services to them along with the already “legalized” outposts, all built on stolen Palestinian lands in the occupied West Bank, including the occupied capital, Jerusalem. (PALINFO 6 February 2022)

- Israel has approved a 1 billion shekel ($310 million USD) plan to connect the illegal settlements in occupied East Jerusalem with neighborhoods in West Jerusalem with the goal of consolidating the occupation, according to a report by Radio Bethlehem and Kol Ha’ir. The Finance Committee for Occupation Municipality has approved these plans and programs in order link neighborhoods in West Jerusalem with the illegal settlements in East Jerusalem. The plan includes expansion of the light rail, roads and infrastructure construction and replacement. 53 million shekels are slated to build the “American Bypass” road which would be a path from Jabal Al-Mukabber to the Ain Al-Lawza junction. Plans include building sidewalks, widening the road, building retaining walls to separate the road from the neighborhoods it will pass through, and sewage and water replacement. This project and others like it have historically created even more travel difficulties for Palestinians and in particular the American Bypass road, which was a project started in the 1960’s. In 2020 the American Road was criticized as “de-facto annexation” by Daniel Seidemann, a lawyer representing Palestinian families who suffered due to the construction. “What we are seeing here is, again, the seamless integration of the northern West Bank, East Jerusalem under sole Israeli control, and the southern West Bank for the purposes of the settlers,” said Seidemann. According to a report by Reuters in 2020. Construction will likely affect Palestinian communities in East Jerusalem as well as in surrounding areas including the allocation of 17.1 million shekels to modernize and expand the road in Beit Hanina heading to the west side of Jerusalem to help facilitate “movement of settlers from the settlements of Bizgat Ze’ev and Nabi Yaakov”, and 22.6 million shekels for the expansion of the street in the Gilo settlement – construction that will affect Palestinians as it will connect with the Begin-Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway. These new roads may pose another difficult question for the international community and for Israelis. In 2019, Route 4370 opened, a segregated highway built with the intention of ease of movement for settlers and engendered criticism as it is referred to as the “Apartheid Road”, built to separate via a wall in the highway, settlers and Palestinians, who are not allowed to enter Jerusalem, Haaretz reported. - The Israeli occupation government intends to advance a plan to expand a Jewish national park onto church-owned lands and Christian holy sites in east Jerusalem by 275 dunums of land. The Times of Israel website claimed that the move, which it described as “unprecedented,” would not strip the landholders of their ownership, but it would give the Israeli government some authority over Palestinian and church properties and religious sites. According to the website, Church officials and rights groups have condemned the measure as a land grab and a threat to the Christian presence in the holy city. The opponents of this Judaization project also highlighted the ties the Israeli institutions responsible for advancing this plan have with settler groups that work to anchor the Jewish presence in east Jerusalem areas, including the flashpoint Sheikh Jarrah neighborhood. Rights groups believe the planned park expansion is part of a larger strategy to control adjacent areas of east Jerusalem to encircle Jerusalem’s Old City with Judaization projects. The website also said that the plan would see the borders of the Jerusalem Walls National Park extended to include a large section of the Mount of Olives along with additional nearby areas. It is slated to receive preliminary approval from the Jerusalem municipality’s local planning and construction committee on March 2. The national park expansion plan is being advanced amid increasingly strained ties between the Israeli government and church leaders, who affirm that their communities are under constant threat by radical Jewish groups. (PALINFO, PEACENOW 20 February 2022)

Israeli Military Orders

- In the village of Kisan, east of Bethlehem, the Israeli government on Thursday approved the theft of 49,000 dunams (21,000 acres) of village land – stretching from the outskirts of the city of Bethlehem on the west all the way to the Dead Sea on the east. The confiscation decision had originally been announced last September on 9/21/2021, but the Palestinian landowners had filed objections with the Israeli court. On Thursday, the Israeli authorities announced that the period of the first and second objections had expired – even though the Palestinian landowners had never had their day in court. Instead, the Israeli authorities simply dismissed the claims of the landowners and said that the land in question would be transferred to Israeli “state ownership”. According to Israeli sources, the Israeli authorities plan to turn the area into a so-called “nature reserve” in order to expand Israeli development on the land. By declaring it a “nature reserve”, they would be allowed by the Israeli government to expand Israeli kibbutzim (agricultural developments under the control of the Israeli Ministry of Agriculture). Thursday’s decision to go ahead with the land confiscation will mean that the Israeli colony of “Ibi Hanahel”, which is built on the lands of Kisan village, will be expanded. The sheds, containers and agricultural barns will be expanded for the benefit of the Jewish Israeli settlers, while the Palestinian farmers will be forcibly displaced from their ancestral land. This land confiscation is allowed by the Israeli government under the so-called ‘absentee property law’, in which a Palestinian landowner who is not continuously present on their land is subjected to the confiscation of that land by the Israeli government. Such land confiscation is illegal under the international law and the Fourth Geneva Convention, but the Israeli government refuses to adhere to its obligations under international law. (IMEMC 11 February 2022)
- An Israeli court approved on Monday the demolition of a house belonging to the family of Palestinian prisoner Mohamed Jaradat in Silat al-Harithiya village in western Jenin, north of the occupied West Bank. Jaradat’s son, Ibrahim, said that his family had submitted a petition to the court through HaMoked human rights group after receiving a demolition notice against the house, but recently it was informed that the court rejected its request. He added that his family was given until next Thursday to evacuate the house and leave, describing the demolition decision as “arbitrary and unjust.” He pointed out that the Israeli occupation authority (IOA) would demolish his apartment along with his father’s house. (PALINFO 21 February 2022)
