Home Demolition & Demolition threats

- An Israeli court denied an appeal against the demolition orders of Palestinian residential tents for Bedouins in the Khirbat Ibziq village, north of Tubas in the northeastern West Bank. The appeal was filed by lawyers working for the Colonization & Wall Resistance Commission. The appeal was filed after the Israeli army invaded the community and handed demotion orders targeting fifteen residential tents in the village. The families in Khirbat Ibziq could be displaced and their belongings

- confiscated at any given moment after losing the appeal. (IMEMC 13 June 2022)

Israeli forces barged into the locality and handed Jadallah Ribbi an order to demolish his 80-square-meter under-construction house. They also handed Ashraf al-Amour a notice, ordering him to stop the construction of his 85-square-meter under-construction house. Recently, Israel's top court gave the army the green light to forcibly expel some 1,300 Palestinians living in 12 villages or hamlets making up the Masafer Yatta area, which relies heavily on animal husbandry as the main source of livelihood, marking one of the largest expulsions carried out by the State of Israel in recent decades. (Wafa 13 June 2022)

Confiscation & Razing of lands

- An ambitious new plan from leaders in Judea and Samaria calls for the establishment of a new national park on nearly 1 million dunams (247,000 acres) of land between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, which would transform the area into a tourist attraction. The area in question begins in the west of Kochav Hashahar and extends to the Herodian site in eastern Gush Etzion. According to the plan, the park will include approximately half the land bordering the Dead Sea, from Qasr al-Yahud – the traditional site of Jesus' baptism – to the Darga and Hazazon ravines. The territory is considered the only open land separating Judea and Samaria, and the political ramifications of implementing the new plan are still unclear. For decades, the Israeli Right has sought to build in the E1 area near Maaleh Adumim in an attempt to link the two regions, a step that thus far has yet to be taken. The Palestinians claim that Israeli construction in E1 would be the nail in the coffin of the two-state solution and have been building illegally in the area to stop Israel from doing the same. In Judea and Samaria, leaders are skipping over the political questions and focusing on the practical aspects of establishing the new park. They say that the land in question includes a number of tourist attractions and would primarily draw day trippers. Local sites of interest to Jews, Christians, and Muslims include the Mar Saba monastery, Qasr al-Yahud, Nabi Musa Mosque, and the remains of the Hasmonean palaces. "We want to set found a new national park, the like of which has never been seen in Judea and Samaria, and create a single network, one product," said Keren Geffen, director-general of the region. A formal plan, compiled following consultation with tourism directors, cites plans such as mobile restaurants, the promotion of a hotel site at the northern end of the Dead Sea, a joint information and reservations center. (ISRAEL HAYOM 13 June 2022)

Israeli Closures

- The main entrance of Aboud village, northeast of Ramallah, remained closed for the fifth consecutive day. Israeli soldiers stationed at a military watchtower at the village entrance shut the metal gate the army had set up at the entrance banning the movement of cars in and out of the village and forcing the residents to take long alternative routes to reach their homes or workplaces. No reason was given for closing the entrance to Aboud, a half-Christian, half-Muslim village surrounded by a cluster of illegal Israeli settlements. (Wafa 13 June 2022)
