Other

- At Least 20 Jews Move Into East Jerusalem's Silwan. Move nearly doubles the number of Jewish settlers in the neighborhood, further heightening tensions between the area's Arab inhabitants and the Jewish newcomers. At least 20 Jews settlers moved into a 12-apartment building in the East Jerusalem neighborhood of Silwan late Wednesday night. The move nearly doubled the number of Jewish settlers in the neighborhood, further heightening tensions between the area's Arab inhabitants and the Jewish newcomers. The settlers replaced the locks on the building two nights ago and brought in household goods early Thursday morning. Ateret Cohanim, an organization that purchases properties in Arab neighborhoods of Jerusalem in order to settle Jews in them, sued a few months ago to have the Palestinian owners of the building evicted. Ateret Cohanim bases its claim on the fact that the lot on which the house was built belonged to a hekdesch, a traditional Jewish landowning association. The quarter in which the building is located was home to a Yemenite Jewish community a century ago. Settler activists pressured the building's residents to leave without being evicted. According to Palestinian sources in Silwan, the building's Palestinian owner admitted that he had reached a financial agreement with Ateret Cohanim. One Palestinian family refused to vacate their apartment, saying their lease was still in effect. According to Palestinian sources, settlers claimed the family's lease was no longer valid. The family remains in the building. In recent weeks, the Ateret Cohanim organization went to great lengths to expand Jewish settlement in Silwan. Three months ago, settlers moved into another home in the area, and an eviction order was served on residents of a nearby building. Palestinians in the area said they believed that the appearance of new locks and doors on another nearby building signaled that more settlers can be expected to move in very soon. There are currently about 15 Jewish families living in the area. (Haaretz 28 August 2015)
