- A 16-dunam (four-acre) noncontiguous parcel of land on a green hilltop in east Jerusalem, which lies between the security barrier and the eastern border of the Jabal Mukhaber neighborhood, could soon become the most volatile in Jerusalem. The Justice Ministry has completed the process, conducted secretly, of transferring ownership of the land to the state, on a temporary basis. Civil researchers hired by the Custodian of Absentee

Properties Department in the Justice Ministry secured proof that the land was purchased by Jews in the early 20th century, and a court ruling has confirmed those findings. In 1924, rents in Jerusalem jumped, making life difficult for the city's Jewish residents. A group named "Vaad Haschenim" (The Neighbors Committee) was set up to purchase land and build a new neighborhood where more affordable housing would be built. They reached out to the Abu Dis town authorities and inquired about purchasing some 400 dunams of land (approximately 100 acres). The head of the purchase association, which was known as Agudat Hadayarim, was chaired by Yehoshua Avizohar Singalovski (the brother of the founder of the Ort chain of technical schools). In 1927, the association completed the purchase of 453 dunams (112 acres) of land. Construction was supposed to begin in 1930, but in 1929 a spate of riots targeting Jews erupted. The plans for a Jewish neighborhood were shelved and building never began. After the riots, Yishuv authorities decided not to build in any of areas of land surrounded by Palestinian areas because of the difficulty of defending them, and rather concentrate building efforts in contiguous areas. After the Great Arab Rebellion and various irregularities discovered in the building association, the group stopped all its activities in April 1936. Of the 453 dunams acquired, the association managed to register only 371 dunams (91.5 acres) in Abu Dis, leaving 82 dunams legally unregistered, even though they had been paid for. In 1948, when the city of Jerusalem was divided following the War of Independence, Abu Dis remained under Jordanian control. It grew and new construction started on some of the land the Jews had purchased, even though they were registered with Jordanian authorities. In 2003, as the Second Intifada raged, Israel built its security barrier, anchoring the existing reality in which only 60 of the 400 or so dunams purchased were left on the Israeli side. The land was transferred to the authority of the Custodian of Absentee Properties. Throughout the years, the ministry located some of the heirs of members of the original Agudat Hadayarim, and transferred the land to them, which were then purchased by the philanthropist Irving Moscowitz. In 2004, 10 Jewish families moved onto the plots as part of the work of the Ateret Kohanim group. However, the largest area of this land on the Israeli side of the security barrier, known as F, was never registered with the Jordanians as Jewish-owned land, and is considered abandoned property. The F land is located in an area known as Sawahra, named after the Bedouin tribe that lives there. It appears that a handful of Arab homes currently stands on the land. For years, the Custodian of Absentee Properties assumed that Agudat Hadayaim had purchased this land, too, but despite efforts that began in 2005 was unable to find proof of that. In 2017, Sigal Yaakobi was appointed Custodian General, and now serves as a judge in financial cases with the Tel Aviv District Court. In 2021, civil researchers Yaakobi hired successfully proved that the F land belong to Jews. That same year, the evidence was presented to the Jerusalem District Court, and Judge Tamar Bar Asher accepted the Justice Ministry's arguments and approved the temporary transfer of the land to the Custodian of Absentee Properties. Israel Hayom has learned that the Custodian General, currently managed by Benzi Feigelson, is trying to located the heirs of the original purchasers. Feigelson has also instructed his staff to conduct more research on the rest of the land in the area. (ISRAELHAYOM 10 August 2022)

The military measure will prevent interaction between families living in the villages of Masafer Yatta and other areas as the notices threatened to seize any vehicle moving in the area, interrogate people moving in the area and fine them if they do not comply with the military order. - Israeli occupation forces placed cement blocks at the main entrance leading to Masafer Yatta area near the village of al-Tiwani to the south of Hebron, in preparation to take over the site to establish a military gate and tower there. Israeli army placed today cement blocks at the entrance to Masafer Yatta after posting a military order two weeks ago to seize the entrance. The Israeli occupation aims to encircle the Masafer Yatta area, thus isolating around 4000 Palestinian residents living there by seizing the sole entrance leading to it and controlling residents' movement in and out of the area as part of Israel's plans aimed at aggravating the suffering of Palestinians to pressure them to leave the area for the benefit of settlement expansion. The seizure of the sole entrance leading to Masafer Yatta will greatly increase the suffering of Palestinian residents, and force them to take long and very difficult alternative roads which are very close to settlement outposts scattered in the area, thus putting them in danger of being attacked by settlers. - For the third consecutive day, Israeli forces today sealed off the main entrances of Silwad town, east of Ramallah. Israeli troops continued to block the western entrance of the town by earth mounds and set up a permanent checkpoint at the town's eastern entrance, inspecting commuters on their way out and in and occasionally closing it for long hours. The closure has cut off the residents from their cemetery, close to the western entrance and forced students enrolled in Birzeit University to take lengthy detours by bus to reach it. The closure has impacted rubbish collection, making the town's main landfill inaccessible and causing rubbish heaps to increasingly litter the streets. (Wafa 30 August 2022)
